Composing Styles

Good writers are aware of their writing habits and preferred composing style. They take responsibility for decisions about how to manage their writing process and are flexible: depending on the writing task or situation, they can modify their preferred approach to get the job done whether writing college essays, business memos, collaborative reports, etc.

Here are four general composing styles we can identify:

1. Heavy Planners – usually think about ideas and plan their writing so carefully in their heads that their first drafts are often more like other writers’ second or third drafts. As a result, they often spend less time revising than other writers. Some heavy planners write this way because they prefer to; others develop this strategy out of necessity. For example, a working mother and student may have to steal odd moments at home to work on her writing. She may have to learn to use every opportunity to think about her writing while she drives, cooks, or spends time with her family.

   Advantages: great mental discipline; efficient writers who spend less time drafting and revising than other writers do. Disadvantages: unexpected interruptions can cause a loss of ideas; less likely to benefit from exploration of new ideas that result from extensive drafting and revising.

2. Heavy Revisers – prefer to find out what they want to say through the act of writing itself. When faced with a writing task, they prefer to sit down at a desk or computer and just begin writing. Writing out their ideas in a sustained spurt of activity reassures them that they have something to say and helps them avoid frustration. Heavy revisers typically spend a great deal of time revising their initial drafts. To do so effectively, they must be able to read their work critically and be able to throw out sometimes large portions of their first drafts.

   Advantages: able to write quickly and capture lots of ideas on the page; rereading and rewriting helps them be open to new ideas and improve their writing. Disadvantages: must be able to ruthlessly critique their writing, cut large sections, or start over if necessary; must be careful to allow enough time for revision or the quality of the work may suffer.
3. Sequential Composers – devote equal amounts of time to planning, drafting, and revising. Rather than planning their writing mentally, as heavy planners do, sequential composers rely on written notes and plans to give shape to their ideas. And unlike heavy revisers, they need to have greater control over form and content as they draft. Allotting equal amounts of time for planning, drafting, and revising helps them deal with writing anxieties: generating notes and plans gives them the confidence to begin drafting, and they generally draft more slowly, rereading and revising their writing as they go.

Advantages: more control over the writing process; realistic about the time and effort it takes to effectively manage a writing task.
Disadvantages: writing habits can become rigid; may waste time developing detailed plans when they are actually ready to write.

4. Procrastinators – avoid writing, putting it off until the last minute. All writers procrastinate sometimes, but procrastinators make a habit of waiting to write until there is only enough time for a final draft.

Advantages: able to write under pressure.
Disadvantages: chances of success are minimal; difficulty managing the writing process efficiently and effectively; added stress!

So which of these writing styles best describes the way you typically write?

- ✔ What planning and revising strategies do you use?
- ✔ If you’re a procrastinator, what are all the ways you procrastinate?
- ✔ If none of these styles seems to fit you, how do you write?

---

Adapted from:

The Writing Center at YVC

Glenn-Anthon 125, 574-4829